The Long Crisis Scenarios

We find deep uncertainty at all three layers of this crisis. To understand what is changing, we need to track what we know and what we don't know.

Layer 1: the public health crisis (will unfold over at least two years)

We're only just finding out how, where, and why people are dying, who's infected, and how the virus spreads. We don't know whether a vaccine will be found, who will own it, and how well or long it will work.

Layer 2: the economic crisis (will unfold over five years or more)

We know that the economic damage is bad but we're only starting to see what happens when you power down a global economy. And whether it can simply be started up again.

Layer 3: polarisation and insecurity (will unfold over a generation)

We have little idea how people are thinking and feeling in homes and communities across the world, with health, wallets, and futures all under attack. Or how societies will react to a prolonged period of extreme stress.

1-2 years
Public health crisis

5-10 years
Economic,
employment,
and financial crisis

A generation or longer
Polarisation and insecurity

Two drivers of change shape how societies respond to an emergency – from polarised to collective action, and from centralised to distributed decision making. These drivers have political, economic, cultural – and psychological – dimensions.

But the future is complicated – and our scenarios do not fall neatly into the quadrants. Governments can be more or less focused on delivery or holding onto power. People can play a local role or be active at all levels of society.

The Blame Game of the Many

The Rise of the Oligarchs

As expectations of government grow, does it have more right than wrong answers?

Fragile...

On the radar

UNEMPLOYMENT HUNGER DEATH DISEASE
RIOTS

"The plan is to default on public problem solving, and then prevent the public from understanding the consequences of that default."

Informal economy

"Looking after our own...
at least in some places and some of the time."

Below
the radar

...Resilient

Winning Ugly

"means not worrying about how it looks and leaving no resource unearthed in order to accomplish the goal"

But transformative strategies will only be possible if we build the foundations for collective action and broad participation from across society in creating a better future. This is the shift from Them and Us to a Larger Us mindset, strategies, and alliances.
